PRESIDENT'S SOUND SENSE

The position taken by President Harding in his personal message to the senate the other day may be disappointing to former soldiers, yet that it is based on sound sense must be apparent to everyone. He says that the effort to reduce taxes will be thwarted if the amount which would be involved in a soldiers' compensation grant were placed on the treasury at this time. This, we selleve, will not be disputed even by the most earnest advocates of the boous, because it is self-evident. While there has been disagreement as to the probable burden that the bill, if enacted into law, would impose on the treasury, it at least would amount to a large sum. The question is not whether the former service men deserve the amount asked, but whether the government s able at this time to pay it. The president takes the latter positionwhile admitting the gratitude duthose pleading for the measure under consideration

The situation certainly is not a pleasant one. Unquestionably many former soldiers would be belped greatly by the receipt of a modest sum. As a nation we owe them much. As a notion it happens that our resources have been strained to the limit, the president states. To pile on top of our present obligations an additional load might make the discharge of all doubtful. That is the view taken in asking delay of the matter. An individual who has no money cannot meet demands. A nation that has exhausted its resources is in the same position. The United States has not exhausted her credit but a further increase of debt would prohibit a reduction of Which of the alternatives should be chosen is a question. The
